Microsoft Edge is a promising browser, but the lack of search history for people has prevented it from gaining momentum. Luckily, that may be on the way. Microsoft has already filed a patent for a new feature that would allow Edge users to save search queries in their browser. The patent, entitled "Managing search history in a computing device", filed last year, describes how the feature would let users access their search history and review them later, or even send them to another device for later review. The patent may relate to a rumored feature for Microsoft Edge, spotted a few weeks ago. The patent also refers to the feature as "view history", and gives it a few of the same features that rival browsers have offered, such as Cortana.
